The invention as in claims 1 to 6 is novel and involves an inventive step.

Regarding the invention as in claims 1 to 6, none of the documents cited in the ISR discloses an interlayer in which skin layers with a glass transition point of equal to or greater than 15°C are alternately laminated with core layers with a glass transition point of less than 15°C, said interlayer having three or more of the core layers and containing 0.3 mg/mm² or more of a plasticizer per unit area of a principal surface of the interlayer measured in a region (referred to as region X hereinbelow) from 5mm to 6mm inwards from the edge of the interlayer, and this feature would not be obvious to a person skilled in the art.

Paragraphs [0013], [0056], [0131] and [0132], [0136] and [0137], and table 2 of document 1 cited in the ISR disclose a laminated glass that uses an interlayer in which skin layers and core layers are alternately laminated, said interlayer having five core layers.

Also, if paragraphs [0101] to [0103], [0109] and table 1 of document 2 are taken into consideration, the glass transition point of the core layers of document 1 is considered to be 0°C, and the glass transition point of the skin layers of document 1 is considered to be around 30°C.

However, document 1 neither indicates nor suggests that the amount of plasticizer per unit area of the principal surface of the interlayer measured at region X is 0.3 mg/mm² or more. Furthermore, if the thickness of the interlayer in example 3 of the description of the present application is taken into consideration, there is a high probability that the content by percentage of the plasticizer in region X of the laminated glass disclosed in document 1 falls outside the numerical range of the present invention.

Documents 3 and 4 cited in the ISR describe the
